

HEAVY ROCKET LAUNCHERS

Heavy rocket launchers are portable weapons designed to destroy vehicles, even heavily armored. They generally fire a rocket with a hollow charge (a cone of molten metal piercing the armor when the charge explodes). The armor-piercing effect of the impact is associated with a blast and heat effect that neutralizes the occupants of the vehicle and generally ignites it.

Models built in the 2020s are more specialized in the destruction of heavily armored targets such as combat borgs or assisted armor. Needless to say, this type of weapon is highly illegal.

The designers at Militech are really a bunch of creepy devils aren't they. The BAZ-12 was supposed designed to make it possible for vehicle crews to carry heavy firepower, without taking up too much space, as well as a more portable RPG for U.S. military personnel. However, the BAZ-12 folds up into such a small package that it can easily fit inside most large suitcases or duffel bags. Due to this the weapon has become extremely popular with black ops teams, and unfortunately terrorists.

This low-yield nuclear device was developed by Militech as a way to destroy hardened bunkers and caves. The Damocles can be set to detonate on impact or by range. After detonation there will be an initial radioactive contamination of twice the area of the blast. The radiation will be considerably high for the first 24 hours but drop quickly after that, contaminating the soil and other materials in the area with low, but still dangerous if exposure is prolonged, levels of radiation. The Damocles is the final result of the re-opening of the W54 program, put forth by General Quartermain in preparation for a third South American Conflict, where caves, underground bunkers, dense jungles, and hardened facilities caused so many problems the last time around. The Damocles is US military use only and the Militech facility that manufactures them is itself on a military base, so even Militech does not have legal access to them.

Although it fires the same ammunition as the Hughes HLAW, the HR-280 doesn't really play in the same category. In particular, it is equipped with a system to propel the rocket much further than its rival, if there is one.
